Joe's hedonistic desire for physical pleasure without the trappings of emotional investment speaks to the void of humanity – the void of non-existence or death – being the only way to end the suffering experienced in the so called mortal coil richpalm casino. von Trier's shots of Joe and Seligman closely resemble Zygmunt Andrychiewicz's The Dying Artist – an image of what is probably meant to be a manifestation of Death playing violin at the bedside of a young man. Did von Trier look upon Andrychiewicz's painting only to see a fellow artist reckoning with his own mortality?

Alongside such noteworthy instances, Efendi also notes some lesser-known, obscure, and arcane parallels like the painting Lamentation of Christ (1475-90) by Andrea Mantegna in the film The Return (2003) by Andrey Zvyaginstev and painting Over the Town (1918) by Marc Chagall in the film Sexy Beast (2000) by Jonathan Glazer, that are much newer discoveries or analyses.

The influence of film on painting has led to a rich dialogue between these two mediums, allowing artists to create works that are visually compelling and narratively engaging. This ongoing exchange continues to push the boundaries of visual storytelling, enriching the world of contemporary art.

Film directors often use color palettes strategically to evoke specific emotions and atmospheres, a technique that painters have also adopted. By carefully selecting and harmonizing colors, artists can create a particular mood or tone that enhances the narrative of the painting.

The pictorial motifs contained in the paintings at the Theatermuseum refer to the world of the theatre. Around six hundred portraits, character and scene pictures done in various techniques bear witness to the fascination that theatre has exercised over such visual artists as Alfred Hrdlicka and Anton Kolig. In contrast to the collection of hand sketches, which contains primarily stage and costume designs, only a few of these pictures were conceived as part of a specific theatre production. The lion's share serves first and foremost to commemorate famous artistic personalities and their roles.
